Telework as an Accommodation for Individuals with Disabilities: Prediction Models for Successful and Satisfying Careers -- $7.95

Unemployment and underemployment of citizens with disabilities continues to be a national crisis. An alternative work arrangement of particular interest to people with disabilities is telecommuting, also called telework. Telework is work performed at a distance using information and communication technology. For many persons with significant disabilities, the increasing prevalence of telework offers the possibility of an accessible barrier-free workplace, flexible scheduling and the elimination of disability-related bias or discrimination. Still, many employers will question the value or need for telecommuting within their business. This research project directly addressed these issues.

Public Private Partnerships -- A Model for Success -- $14.99

A Collection of Successful Approaches Reported from 20 Employers. Companies report success stories related to the recruitment and hiring of people with disabilities, along with return to work models of success for when an employee becomes disabled and is returning to employment.
